POEMS

Kellie Hay

Olives, Oil, & Bread

I found poetry
in anthropology
fashioning
what texts may mean

Once one arranges data’s tales only partial truths prevail

So be it

When is outside in?
Begin again;
others write in speaking pens.

Who listens without her own voice
telling the tale?
So frail,
our knowledge when we start and stop
through our own lens.

Kinship, rhythm, rhyme—
bodies move in different time.

And so do blood and borders

Different language games shifting, contested lands
crying for rivers
dry seas dead
dying for olives, oil, and bread
On Becoming

Why do you think you are known after only ten years?
Have you finished changing breathing, imagining?

We can pass the immigration test Let’s see
I know what you take in your tea
your favorite
   color
   books
   perfume
   birds
   songs
   shoes
   wine
   crackers
brand of veggie burgers
I know . . .
you wish you could have an affair with Leonard Cohen your most cherished dive restaurant
how you load the dishwasher
what makes you cry
How interesting

Shall I just take you for granted now?

We are dead once I know you for what are we to become?
Peaceful Complexity

In another life, if not the one before,
I may have walked with you,
unadorned, with conscious categories or settled comfort zones

With only a breath—a walk within uncanny winds, feeling the strange serenity there not knowing what to be or expecting any outcome—we keep moving

Water leaves no imprint, as sacred as it is; kindred spirits will no paths when they meet their friends

All I can do is recognize you, in this life, my familiar/unfamiliar friend
Spicy Spaces

Something sensuous happens when you get near my spice rack . . .

The smell of Jasmine tea,
cinnamon, hing,
cumin
you and me

In the twilight of our sunroom
I see your beauty eyes closed
hands folded
I feel you breathing

Just then right when you fall asleep
   I am
Awake, Awake, Awake